Four strategies to engage boys in literacy and close the gender gap. By the time boys get to year six, as you will find in most primary schools in the land, there is a small group of boys, the peer police cadets, who are dragging boys off cliffs. If we don't act sooner by the time these boys reach year 10 they can be virtually running the place,...

Boys in particular seem to value individual attention and tend to work harder when they know they are being monitored closely. They respond well when given help to organise their coursework and to plan their revision. In schools where anti-learning peer pressure is a major barrier to boys' achievement, close monitoring can give boys
